There can be no question about whether we should or should not transform our society in the direction of sustainability.

- Alan AtKisson

Alan AtKisson, born on 29 March 1960, has been working in the field of sustainability since 1988. In 1990 he co-founded the Sustainable Seattle initiative, which produced the first urban sustainability indicator set and became a model, recognized by the United Nations in 1996, for similar projects in many countries. In 1992 he founded a consultancy focused on sustainability management, measurement, and capacity building, and today the AtKisson Group has affiliates in nine countries. His clients include United Nations agencies, global companies, and governmental initiatives. Tools and methods developed by the AtKisson Group are widely used in sustainability education and management. Alan is the author of five books, including the bestseller Believing Cassandra (1999, 2010), and The Sustainability Transformation (2010). A dual citizen of Sweden and the United States, he lives in Stockholm, Sweden. He currently serves as Assistant Director-General of Sida, the Swedish International Development Cooperation Agency, where he leads the Department of Partnership and Innovation.
